People pay for results, not for "AI."

One rule, then the prompts.

Nobody pays you for "using AI." They pay you to solve a problem faster and better than they could themselves. AI is just the tool that lets a beginner deliver at a level people will pay for — today, not in a year.

So the game is simple: pick a service people already buy → use AI to do it 3–5× faster → get it in front of people who have the problem. These 10 prompts walk that exact loop: find the offer, find the buyer, pitch, deliver, get paid again.

How to use this

Open any AI chat. Copy a prompt, swap the orange blanks for your details, send. Read the output like a first draft — keep what's true, cut what isn't. The prompt does 80%; your judgment does the 20% that makes it sellable.

- Prompts 1–3 — decide what to sell and find who buys it.
- Prompts 4–6 — win the client (pitch, scope, price).
- Prompts 7–10 — deliver fast, then turn one job into three.

Pick the offer. Find the buyer.

1 Turn your skills into a service people pay for

Most beginners freeze on "what do I even sell?" This turns whatever you're okay at into a concrete paid offer.

Act as a pragmatic freelance coach. Here's what I can do: [list 3-5 things you're decent at – writing, spreadsheets, editing, translating, design, research, admin]. My spare time per week: [hours]. Give me 5 specific services I could sell within 7 days, each as: (a) a one-line offer, (b) who buys it, (c) a realistic first price, (d) how AI speeds up delivery. Rank by fastest-to-first-dollar. No vague ideas – only things a beginner can actually deliver this week.

2 Find where your buyers already hang out

You don't need an audience. You need to stand where people are already asking for what you sell.

I sell this service: [your offer from Prompt 1]. List 12 specific places online where people actively ask for or hire this – name exact subreddits, Facebook groups, forums, freelance categories, and job-board search terms. For each: what to search, and the buying-intent phrase to look for (e.g. "looking for someone to..."). Prioritize places with buyers, not competitors.

3 Spot the offer that's underpriced in your market

Same skill, different packaging = 3× the price. This finds the angle nobody else is selling.

My service: [offer]. My target buyer: [who]. Act as a positioning strategist. Give me 3 ways to package this so it looks like a premium, specific solution instead of a generic gig – with the exact headline I'd use for each, and why that buyer would pay more for it.

4 The cold pitch that actually gets replies

Short, specific, about them. This writes it in the tone buyers respond to — not the desperate one.

Write a 5-sentence cold message to a potential client. My service: [offer]. Them: [who they are / what I noticed about their business or post]. Rules: lead with a specific observation about THEM, name one concrete result I can deliver, no flattery, no "I hope this finds you well," one clear next step. Give me 3 versions in different tones (direct / friendly / expert).

5 Scope the job before it eats your week

"Can you just also..." is how beginners work for free. This locks scope politely, up front.

A client wants: [what they asked for]. Write me a short scope reply that (a) confirms exactly what's included, (b) names what's NOT included, (c) states the price and turnaround, (d) invites them to say yes. Friendly but firm. Then list 3 "scope creep" requests I should watch for on this kind of job and the one-line response to each.

6 Price it without underselling yourself

Beginners guess low and resent it. This gives you a defensible number and the words to say it.

Service: [offer]. Roughly [hours] of work. Buyer type: [who]. Give me a low / fair / confident price for this, with a one-sentence justification I can say out loud for each. Then write the exact reply if they say "that's too expensive" — that holds my price without being defensive.

Deliver fast. Get paid again.

7 Turn a blank page into a first draft in one shot

The fastest way to look experienced: never start from zero. This gets 80% down so you can polish the 20%.

Produce a strong first draft of: [the exact deliverable – e.g. a 600-word blog post, a 5-email sequence, a spreadsheet structure, a logo brief]. Context: [client, audience, goal, any details they gave]. Match this style: [paste a sample they like, or describe the tone]. Flag anywhere you're guessing so I can fix it. Give me the draft, then 3 things I should double-check before sending.

8 Make a portfolio piece before you have clients

No work history? Build a realistic sample. Buyers hire proof, not promises.

COPY · PASTE · FILL THE BLANKS

I want a portfolio sample for: [service]. Invent a realistic fake client in [industry], then produce a complete, polished sample deliverable for them, plus a 3-line case-study caption ("Client wanted X → I did Y → result Z") I can show prospects. Make it specific enough to look real.

9 The delivery message that earns the next job

How you hand over work decides if they come back. This bakes in the repeat/referral ask.

COPY · PASTE · FILL THE BLANKS

Write the message I send when delivering: [deliverable] to [client]. Include: a confident one-line summary of what I did, how to give feedback, and a soft line offering the natural next piece of work. Warm, professional, not needy.

10 Your one-week get-paid plan

Turns all of the above into a checklist you can actually run this week.

COPY · PASTE · FILL THE BLANKS

Based on my service [offer] and [hours] free per week, build me a 7-day plan to land my first paying client: one concrete action per day (find buyers, pitch, sample, follow up), with a target number for each. Keep it doable for someone with a full-time job.
